

Amazon launches lockers in London Tube stations

Amazon is introducing its lockers in two London Underground stations to make picking up orders more convenient for shoppers on the go.

The online giant is installing lockers at Finchley Central and Newbury Park stations. Customers will be able to collect orders from Monday.

Transport for London (TfL) has been working with retailers to introduce a number of click-and-collect services as well as pop-up shops to its stations. Asda has launched click-and-collect points at six Tube stations.

Amazon UK managing director Christopher North said: "Some of our first lockers in the world were launched in London and they have become the preferred delivery option for many in the capital. We are delighted to have teamed up with TfL to bring the convenience of Amazon Lockers to an even greater number of London commuters."

Amazon is extending locker locations

Mayor of London Boris Johnson said: "London Underground's click-and-collect revolution is going from strength to strength, attracting some of the most recognisable names in retail."

Amazon first introduced the lockers in 2011, and has rapidly rolled them out.